CANADIAN LITERARY MANUSCRIPTS IN THE
HUMANITIES RESEARCH CENTER,
THE UNIVERSITY OF TEXAS AT AUSTIN

A survey of the manuscript holdings of the Humanities Research Center at the University of Texas, using very broad criteria¹, turned up nearly two hundred Canadian, or nominally Canadian, writers. The great majority are represented by only a few items of correspondence, but there are some holdings of significant interest. Even a single letter may, of course, be important, and therefore all material located has been included in the checklist which follows, with a very few exceptions.²

Two Canadian-born writers who took up residence in the United States early in their careers have substantial collections in the Humanities Research Center. The Thomas B. Costain collection is the largest collection encountered in the survey, too large in fact to permit the fairly detailed enumeration of contents accorded the other holdings, without unduly increasing the length of the checklist. The Costain collection covers nearly all phases of the writer's career, and would be particularly useful in any study of his research methods or publishing history, since it includes research notes and correspondence with his literary agents and publishers. In addition, Costain's collection includes the manuscripts of many of his novels and a large correspondence. A complete and detailed description of the collection has yet to be undertaken.

Another writer who spent his writing career in the U.S. and although appearing in Watters' Checklist, is rarely considered to be a Canadian writer is Henry Bedford-Jones who under a number of pseudonyms wrote historical romances and adventure stories for American popular magazines. At the height of his popularity during and after World War II, Bedford-Jones was reputed to be the highest-paid American writer. The Bedford-Jones collection has been included in the checklist; most of it consists of typescripts of novels, together with a large correspondence with Donald Kennicott, editor of Blue Book magazine, to which Bedford-Jones regularly contributed.

The Bedford-Jones/Kennicott files, previously uncatalogued, also revealed a correspondence between Kennicott and Theodore G. Roberts between 1946 and 1952. During that period, Roberts contributed stories to Blue Book, most of them based on incidents from Malory, which Roberts in one letter calls, "my Sir Thomas Bible." Blue Book was such an important source of income for Roberts that despite Kennicott's tendency to reject stories he considered too "Canadian", Roberts tried to persuade the Canadian government to lift its ban against Blue Book in 1947. In a letter to the Minister of National Revenue, Roberts says that Sir Charles G.D. Roberts ranked the magazine next to Blackwood's.

Two other writers of an earlier generation, who spent most of their writing careers in England, are represented by substantial holdings of correspondence: Sir Gilbert Parker and John Buchan. Parker's correspondence, mostly with editors of magazines or publishers like J.M. Stoddart of Lippincott's, spans nearly forty years. Most of it is dry and businesslike, although it attests to the variety of Parker's activities in literature and politics. Among the letters of John Buchan, perhaps the most interesting is his correspondence with Hugh Walpole during Buchan's tenure as Governor-General of Canada, in which Buchan comments on Walpole's work and on the English literary scene. In a letter to J.B. Priestley, Buchan compares his political creed to Priestley's: "I believe profoundly in the progressive socialization of the State," he writes, "but the vital thing must always be the preservation of the spiritual integrity of the individual."

Most of the small collection of Ernest Thompson Seton manuscripts consists of letters to Gerald Christy, Seton's lecture manager in England. At regular intervals Seton sent Christy ingenious proposals for money-making schemes: a modified form of chess called "War", a "fairy lamp" or a proposal for turning Punch and Judy shows into an advertisement for Pears Soap. Similarly, the bulk of Bliss Carman's letters deal with business rather than literary matters, with Carman's editorship of the University Society's "World's Best Poetry in Ten Volumes" series, and his activities as a literary agent in New York. Mazo De La Roche's correspondence covers almost the whole of her career. In a letter in 1919 to Christopher Morley she describes her misadventures in submitting her first book of stories to a publisher, but assures Morley, "someway, I cannot think your interest in me is misplaced." In 1927, in another letter to Morley, she expressed her surprise at the sudden success of Jalna and in later letters to Hugh Walpole her travels in England are described.

Among contemporary Canadian writers, perhaps the most significant collection is Malcolm Lowry's, which includes a manuscript of Under the Volcano and letters to Gerald Noxon and James Stern. The manuscript was Lowry's gift to Gerald and Betty Noxon, and is of particular importance because of the large amount of additional holograph material on the verso of most of the typescript pages. The manuscript is loosely bound in two volumes, the first containing sections I through VI of the novel, the second, section VII to the end. In the second volume there is very little material on the verso of the typescript, but about 170 additional holograph pages containing notes, alternative versions of events in the novel, typing instructions and so on. The remarkable Noxon letters are a valuable supplement to the manuscript, providing a chronology of Lowry's work on the novel and clues to several of his sources and influences. In the earliest of the Noxon letters, Lowry tells Noxon, "I do not care, I tell myself at present, to live in a world where everyone cheats, so do not live in it, but rather, like Timon of Athens, on the edge of it: a shack on the sea in a deserted village." The letter was written from Dollarton, B.C. in the fall of 1940; in it Lowry mentions working on two novels, including "a novel about Mexico." Lowry's letters to Noxon over the next seven years chronicle the "continuous tragedies" of Lowry's personal life against the background of his work on Under the Volcano from its "early pachydermatous prose," as Lowry describes it in a 1942 letter, to Lowry's exhilaration at the novel's acceptance and critical reception.

The more important of Lowry's letters to James Stern appear in Selected Letters of Malcolm Lowry (1965). The Stern letters cover only a year or so, but one letter is of special interest because it describes in detail some of Lowry's experiences in a Mexican jail, while several of the other letters deal with Lowry's work in progress, before and after the publication of Under the Volcano.

The largest collection of individual manuscripts by a Canadian writer is the Norman Levine collection, consisting of holograph notes and typescripts for Canada Made Me and manuscripts of twenty-five of Levine's stories. Most of the story manuscripts consist of several drafts of each story, from two to as many as eighteen. Levine has provided explanatory notes for each of the manuscripts describing the story's genesis and publication history.

Two other Canadian novelists with small but significant holdings in the Humanities Research Center are Ethel Wilson and Ernst Bornemann. Both writers were published in the United States by Harper Bros., and their collections consist of letters to and from Harpers. The Ethel Wilson letters deal with Harpers' publication of Lilly's Story and Swamp Angel, in the course of which she developed a friendship with Elizabeth Lawrence, an editor at Harpers, so that the letters go beyond matters of publication into their mutual views on literature. In some cases, Ms. Wilson made changes in her work at Lawrence's suggestion. In Lilly's Story she "threw out a shovelful of 'ands'," and made other substantive changes, while in Tuesday and Wednesday she removed "traces of the author who had intruded." Wilson's craftsmanship and attention to detail are apparent in her letters. "I don't think the salmon that far up the Courtenay River are 'springs'," she remarks, and substitutes the name "Vardoe" for her odious character in Swamp Angel after discovering that the name she had originally chosen belonged to a "nice man in Ottawa." After the publication of Lilly's Story she expresses frustration at one critic's opinion that her work is the most interesting to appear in Canada since the War. "That should not be," she writes. "There should be more, and better."

Letters to publishers or editors in the United States provide a major source for material found in the survey. Two large collections of material from the publishing houses of Harper Bros. and Knopf remain only partially catalogued, and while an attempt was made to survey this material it is probable that additional correspondence remains in these collections. The correspondence of three Canadian poets with the American editor and poet Cid Corman resulted in an important collaboration. The three, Irving Layton, Raymond Souster and Gael Turnbull were all contributors to Origin, which Corman edited. In the Layton-Corman correspondence, Layton discusses his ideas about poetry in the context of the work of contemporary American poets such as Charles Olson and Robert Creeley. "Obscurity in modern poetry is almost regarded as a virtue, and one is titillated by it as by a puzzle," he writes in a comment on Olson, "but when a chap writes English in a crabbed, tortured style, hoping that the thing will be mistaken for originality, he's let himself wide open for swings and swipes." In another letter he admits that Olson is "an original quantity," who "may have started me off towards groping to a new style, but it'll have to be my own."

Layton's salty, sometimes irritable letters range over a large area of contemporary Canadian and American literature, and touch on his career as a teacher of political theory at McGill University and his political views in general.

Both Layton's and Souster's letters to Cid Corman mention the activities of the Contact Press, but Souster's letters are more specific, and would be of importance to anyone concerned with its history and its contribution to the development of younger poets like George Bowering and Gwen MacEwen. As Souster writes to Corman, "Without Contact Press in the past ten years a lot of good poets would have quit by now, just thrown in the sponge."

Two Canadian collections in the Humanities Research Center include a large group of manuscript material, Robin Skelton's and Earle Birney's. The Birney material listed in the checklist omits a substantial amount of material — letters, manuscripts and translations — in photocopy form. The Birney correspondence consists mainly of business or personal rather than literary matters, but taken as a whole the large collection of poem manuscripts gives a good idea of Birney's working method.

While the Canadian manuscript material in the Humanities Research Center is limited, it has sufficient breadth and, on occasion, depth to provide a useful source for scholarship in Canadian studies and Canadian literature. The compiler would like to thank the staff of the Humanities Research Center, particularly Ms. Lois Garcia and Ms. Dolores Briones for their patient assistance during the preparation of the material, and Professor Brian Dobbs of the English Department, the University of Texas, for valuable advice. Finally, all students of Canadian literature owe a debt of gratitude to Dr. Joseph Jones of the English Department, the University of Texas, for his dedicated work over a long period in making the Canadian collection in the University's library one of the strongest holdings of Canadian literature in the United States.

Miscellaneous: The largest part of the miscellaneous material in the Costain collections consists of correspondence between Brandt and Brandt, Costain's literary agents, and various foreign and domestic publishers, broadcasting companies, book clubs, magazines and so on, as well as inter-office communications of Brandt and Brandt dealing with Costain's work. The Brandt and Brandt correspondence is dated from 1939 to 1957. The collection also includes letters and inter-office memos of Doubleday and Co., one of Costain's publishers, publicity releases, memoranda of publishers' agreements and similar material pertinent to the publication, distribution, publicity and sales of Costain's work. There are also some 1700 letters to Costain from readers, dated from 1943 to 1965.
