is relatively slight, the era on which Ford focuses has had and continues to have an influence on later generations of Canadians. Contact Press, First Statement Press and 20th Century are a few of the Canadian enterprises that might have been different, or not at all, if it weren't for Paris in the twenties and thirties.

Scripta Manet... A Bio-Bibliography of J.B. Rudnyc'kyj. Compiled by Ol'ha Woycenko, et al. Winnipeg: 1975. 236 p., paper.

This is a very important work. There are two well researched biographies: The impact of Rudnyc'kyj in establishing a Department of Slavic Studies at the University of Manitoba, his great and successful efforts toward the building of a Slavic collection, as well as the subsequent publishing of Slavic reading texts and his work as a member of the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism have been discussed in a very complete manner; and, there is also a very thorough and clearly presented introduction to Rudnyc'kyj's work as a onomatologist.

Following these two biographies is a chronological listing of Rudnyc'kyj's works, from 1933 to 1975. These are listed by title (which has been translated into English) within each year. Pagination is given for periodical articles. There are no locations given; however, I would presume these are all held in the Library at the University of Manitoba. The bibliography is usefully cross-referenced with an index for personal names, for geographical listings, and for periodicals, newspapers and serials.

This is a practical and informative work which will be of considerable use and interest to researchers and casual readers alike.

University of Toronto Doctoral Theses, 1968-1975: A Bibliography. [By] School of Graduate Studies, University of Toronto. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1977. ix, 166 p. $10.00 ISBN 0-8020-3342-3

As theses by doctoral students are being written in an ever-increasing range of areas of human knowledge, it is encouraging to learn that the University of Toronto has been able to continue the production of a published listing of its doctoral theses. The present volume, which covers the years 1968 to 1975, is a sequel to a 1968 book entitled University of Toronto Doctoral Theses, 1897-1967, compiled by Judy Mills and Irene Dombra.

This volume, compiled by Judy Mills with the assistance of Eileen Davis, lists 2,323 titles. The first volume contains only 325 more titles than the second compilation. This comparison indicates, as A.E. Safarian, Dean of Graduate Studies of the University of Toronto, has noted in the Foreword "that almost as many doctoral theses have been completed at the University of Toronto during the last eight years as were completed during the previous fifty years."

The theses for the degrees of Doctor of Philosophy, Doctor of Education, Doctor of Juris, Doctor of Music and Doctor of Social Medicine are arranged in separate sections. However, 2,249 of the 2,323 theses fall under the Doctor of Philosophy degree. The theses for this degree are arranged in thirty-eight broad subject categories. Several of these broader categories are further divided into sub-categories. For example, the subject 'Education' contains a break-down into eleven divisions.

While these categories usually reflect the academic department in which the search was conducted, this arrangement was impossible for some theses because of the interdisciplinary nature of the academic departments and the multiple subject interests of the theses. Within each subject area there is a chronological arrangement of the titles. When more than one thesis appears in a year, the authors are arranged alphabetically. Similar chronological lists were prepared for the four other doctoral degrees. The entries in the listing are numbered consecutively. The index which contains only author entries refers to the entry number in the bibliography.

This straightforward arrangement has resulted in a very useful reference tool. One hopes that more and more Canadian universities will follow the University of Toronto and McGill University, in embarking upon the compilation of similar directories of their graduate theses.
